A New Name .. New Address ...

For twenty years I have operated as a full time dealer and Professional Numismatist under the name of - -

JAMES KELLY
Third & Broadway
Dayton 7, Ohio

However, for the past several years our space and facilities have not been adequate to handle the steady increase in business, thus making it impossible to give the prompt and efficient service to which our customers are entitled.

To accomplish this we have moved to larger quarters in the newly constructed Herman Miller Building where we now occupy approximately 1,500 square feet of ground floor space, combining a small retail store with our offices. This nearly doubles the capacity of our old location.

We have also expanded in all other phases of our business as well, making it advisable to incorporate. However, there will be no change in business policy or ethics and I will still maintain the close personal supervision over all transactions.

MAY WE BE OF SERVICE ?

We are now officially ...

NEW ZEALAND'S MAORI COIN

In 1840 the British Capt. Hubbard landed in New Zealand and a peace treaty was then concluded between the British and the native Maoris. This is known as the Treaty of Waitangi and represents New Zealand's first Magna Carta.

Consequently, the newly won territory enjoyed singular rights and no disturbances of any size took place during the following years of British occupation until the islands became a dominion and thus part of the British Commonwealth of Nations.

The Maori population is of Polynesian origin but resembles the white race to a great extent; their highly developed culture and excellent character won them the unique privilege of being treated as equals socially by the usually rather reserved British society.

During the last war and now Maori soldiers and officers are known for their great personal courage and skill.

In 1935 a dollar-size coin, a Crown, was issued in commemoration of the Waitangi events, showing the British captain and the Maori prince shaking hands. In 1940, one hundred years after Waitangi, a series of commemoratives was struck to honor the great changes that had taken place in the islands since the British landed.

The half-crown shows a symbolic girl pointing to both the old and the new New Zealand represented by native huts and modern concrete buildings.

The bronze Penny has the native kiwi bird perched on a tree. The third denomination, the Half Penny, has the Maori symbol, a sort of totem pole, or rather the crude representation of an ancient divinity.

These three coins supplement the regular issues of all denominations which usually show the King's head.

In recent years, particularly since George V, it has become more and more frequent for the British Government to issue special coins for their Australasian possessions in order to give the increased feeling of freedom which these various islands do now enjoy a more concrete expression.

Thus there are coins for the Fiji Islands, the Seychelles, and others, in addition to those struck for New Zealand recently and the ones issued in Australia for a long time. Most of these coins were struck at the London Mint but occasionally the Australian mints did some of the work.

ALBANIA'S ODD COINS

Independent since 1912, when it emerged as a result of the Balkan campaign, the little country of Albania changed from a republic into a kingdom in 1925 and its president, Ahmad Zogu, set himself up as Zog I.

The country lacks railroads and many other modern conveniences entirely, but has a splendid coinage of great beauty, struck partly at Vienna and partly at Rome. These coins exist in all metals and show classical types, thus hinting at the heritage the Albanian people carried on from their Illyrian ancestors.

The monetary system, controlled by the Albanian National Bank, rests on a gold standard comparable to the French gold franc. The Frank Ari, or gold franc, is subdivided into 5 Lek or Pounds and the latter consists of 100 Quindars or Centimes. There are paper bills for the high denominations and gold coins of the values of 100, 20 and 10 Franka Ari. The silver included the dollar-size 5 Franka Ari and the 2 and 1 Frank. Next are the nickel coins of 1, 1/2 and 1/4 Lek, followed by copper 10 and 5 Quindars.

Many types of coins have been issued in the few years of the country's existence and yet today most of them are hard to obtain. The major part of these pieces shows the national coat of arms crowned by a goat's head helmet. This is the famous helmet worn by the great Skanderbeg, Albania's medieval hero-king, whose portrait can be seen on a special commemorative gold 20 Franka piece. The helmet Albania's most coveted possession, formed part of the Vienna Collection before the outbreak of the second World War.

When Italy conquered the country in 1939, the monetary system was assimilated to the Italian system but the names of the denominations remained and the conqueror's portrait replaced that of Zog.

CONFUSING IMPERIAL NAMES

Coins of modern or even medieval rulers are expected to have the name of the ruler on them in more or less abbreviated form, either in Latin or the native tongue, but still clearly understandable. Thus the name "Charles" may appear as Charles, or as Carolus, but always in such a way that the collector has no doubt about the ruler's name.

During the Roman Empire, however, some rulers chose names other than their own. Sometimes what started out as a mere nickname soon became the name by which the emperor was known. History and schools today teach only the nickname; however, the coins actually show the real or official name. A collector not too well versed in ancient history can, therefore, become confused quite easily.

For instance, "Augustus" was actually only a title which Octavian had assumed, and on his coins he usually called himself Caesar's son. To the uninitiated, a coin with "Caesar" might easily be confused with a coin of Julius Caesar.

Emperor Caligula, who ruled from 37 to 41 A.D., derived his strange name from the military boot common in his day. Being a youth who grew up among the soldiery, he was soon called "Little Boot" by the people. Still, on all coins and official documents, he is only referred to as Caius Caesar, his true name.

Both Vespasian and his son Titus had the same name -- Titus Flavius Vespasianus. They looked alike to such a degree that only the fact the elder Vespasian never used his first name spelled in full, distinguishes the coins of the two men.

It is easy to spot the coins of Antoninus Pius who ruled from 138 to 161 A.D. But his son Marcus Aurelius, and his grandson Commodus both were officially known as Marcus Antoninus and are so called on their coins. Fortunately, most of their coinage is dated and is no problem to the collector. However, in 196 A.D., Emperor Septimius Severus decided to elevate his elder son Caracalla to the co-regency, adding further confusion to the Antoninus coinage. Caracalla is the name of a cloak or coat worn around the end of the second Century by elegant Romans, and a coat of this type was the favorite garment of the young Emperor whose actual name was Antoninus Pius. Thus, a large and long series of coins with the name of "Antoninus Pius" started to appear.

Of course, an advanced collector knows that the portraits of the real "Antoninus Pius" and those of the young Caracalla using this name, are quite different.

In 218 A.D. Caracalla's cousin, Elagabalus became emperor. The name "Elagabalus" being of Eastern origin, the young ruler took instead the official name of ...you guessed itAntoninus Pius! His coinage is sometimes undistinguishable from that of Caracalla but the expert knows the small yet significant details that allow us to separate the two series.

Similar difficulties exist also with the coins of Galerius (292-311) who was officially known as Maximianus II of Gallus, who was known as Constantius Caesar, and even later, with the coins of Constans II who oddly enough was known officially as Constantine III!
